In recent years, Agenda 21 has become the target of a number of conspiracy theories. One of the most prominent of these theories is Glenn Beck's claim that Agenda 21 is a plan by the United Nations to implement a global government and take away private property.

There is no evidence to support Beck's claims. Agenda 21 is a non-binding resolution that does not have the force of law. It does not give the United Nations any authority to implement a global government or take away private property.

Beck's claims about Agenda 21 are based on a number of misunderstandings and misrepresentations of the resolution. For example, Beck claims that Agenda 21 calls for the creation of "smart growth" communities that will restrict people's ability to own property. However, Agenda 21 actually encourages the development of sustainable communities that are designed to meet the needs of residents while protecting the environment.

Beck's claims about Agenda 21 have been repeatedly debunked by experts. In 2012, the United Nations released a statement that said, "Agenda 21 does not call for the creation of a world government or the abolition of private property."

Despite the lack of evidence to support his claims, Beck continues to promote his conspiracy theory about Agenda 21. He has used his radio show and television program to spread his message, and he has written a book about the subject.

Beck's conspiracy theory about Agenda 21 is a dangerous and harmful myth. It has no basis in fact, and it has the potential to undermine public trust in the United Nations and other international organizations.
