The children of Sumer and Akkad lived in a world that was very different from our own. They did not have the same toys or games that children have today, and they did not go to school in the same way that we do.

However, the children of Sumer and Akkad were just as important to their families and communities as children are today. They were loved and cared for, and they were expected to contribute to the family and community in whatever way they could.

## The Family Unit in Sumer and Akkad

The family was the most important social unit in Sumer and Akkad. The family consisted of the husband, wife, and children, as well as the husband's parents and other relatives.

The father was the head of the household, and he was responsible for providing for the family. The mother was responsible for raising the children and caring for the home.

The children were expected to obey their parents and to help with the family work. The boys typically helped their father with the farming or herding, while the girls helped their mother with the housework and childcare.

## Education in Sumer and Akkad

The children of Sumer and Akkad did not go to school in the same way that we do today. Instead, they were educated at home by their parents or by private tutors.

The boys were typically taught to read, write, and do math. The girls were typically taught to cook, sew, and weave.

## The Role of Children in Sumer and Akkad Society

The children of Sumer and Akkad played an important role in society. They were responsible for helping with the family work, and they were also expected to contribute to the community.

The boys were often expected to join the army, while the girls were expected to marry and raise a family.

The children of Sumer and Akkad were also important to their religion. They were often involved in religious ceremonies and festivals, and they were expected to learn the religious texts and rituals.
